Peace Building and Conflict Transformation

Difficult to define and challenging to achieve in a sustainable manner, peace has often been regarded as the absence of conflict. Yet, it also has a positive autonomous existence. However, conflict continues to be a major obstacle to achieving peace. Since contemporary political, ethnic and linguistic conflicts are characterized by great complexity and uncertainty due to the rapidly shifting dynamics of power and political borders, approaches to peace need to be considered in a holistic manner. For a creative understanding and possibility of building peace in such a manner it is imperative that conflict and peace be considered from multidisciplinary perspectives. SAMUDRA invites original articles dealing with, but not restricted to the following areas:

- Theories and concepts of peacebuilding and conflict transformation
- Strategies of peacebuilding and conflict transformation
- Conflict transformation at the inter-personal level
- Inter-community peacebuilding
- Memory studies and peacebuilding
- Constructing counter narratives
- Gender studies and peacebuilding
- Organizational behaviour and conflict transformation
- The economics of peacebuilding and conflict transformation
- Peace education
- Media and peacebuilding
- Role of education in peacebuilding
- Social change and conflict transformation
- Environmental issues and peacebuilding
